pacts canine and feline behavioural welfare.•A tool to assess behavioural welfare practices veterinary clinics. Interviews had higher reliability and feasibility than appointment view responses were inconsistent with observations, indicating low validity. •A mixed s needed to maximize reliability, feasibility and validity. Veterinary care can both positively act animal welfare in terms of behavioural welfare. This occurs both in the veterinary clinic is with patients and management of their stress, fear and aggression, and in the animal's provision of behaviour and training advice for behavioural management as a whole. An assessment scheme, incorporating management-, resource- and animal-based measures of rugh interviews and appointment observations, was developed to assess practices related are in small animal veterinary clinics. It was tested for reliability, validity, and feasibility in mixed animal veterinary clinics, and information concerning current behavioural welfare collected. Based on weighted kappa statistics, inter-observer reliability showed almost for interview scoring (Kw=0.82 and 0.81) and substantial agreement for appointment observation scoring (Kw=0.74 and 0.70); however, at the individual question and handling item level, weighted kappa statistics for inter-observer reliability ranged greatly. Interviews were more feasible to carry out than appointment observations, although discrepancies between interview responses and veterinary staff-patient interactions observed during appointments suggest that interviews might be a less valid measure. Descriptive results suggest that there is enough variability in most assessed areas to allow for differentiation between veterinary clinics on the basis of their behavioural welfare practices. Additional research is required to explore these trends in strengths and areas for improvement in a larger sample of veterinary clinics.

Abstract The increasing popularity of local food consumption can be attributed to the heightened awareness of food safety concerns, carbon emissions produced from food transportation, and an understanding of how large corporations' obtain their food supplies. Although there is increasing discussion on both the local and organic food movement independently, there is not a wide availability of literature examining the motivations and perceptions of consumers with regard to farmers' markets. Issues such as perceptions about what type of food consumers are purchasing at markets, nor the main motivations for frequenting such establishments are discussed. Therefore the purpose of this study was to determine consumer motivations, benefits, and perceptions of farmers' markets. Using the case study location of Toronto, Canada, this study surveyed 300 participants during the fall of 2011.

d safety concerns, carbon emissions produced from food is increasing discussion on both the local and organic food tions of consumers with regard to farmers' markets. Issues ons for frequenting such establishments are discussed. farmers' markets. ## Le banche dati

Circa 400 banche-dati a cui è abbonata l'Università di Bologna

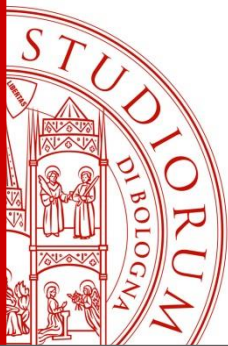

Attraverso l'indice per area disciplinare

(https://almastart.unibo.it/primo-explore/dbsearch?vid=39UBO\_VU)

puoi trovare quelle più utili nell'ambito delle scienze agrarie

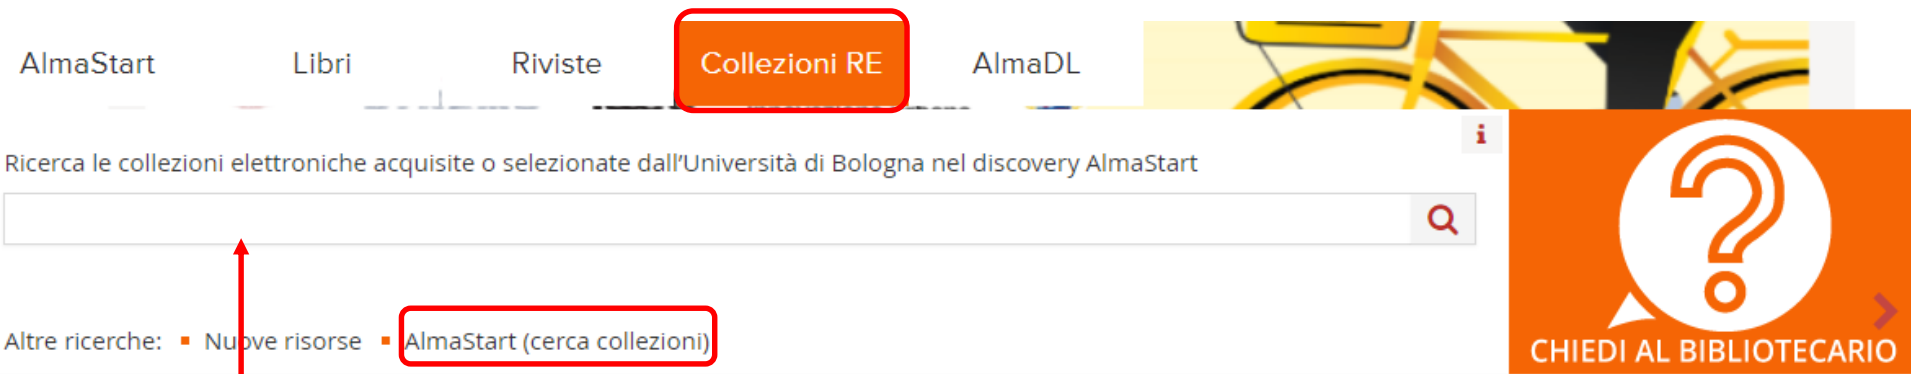

Le banche dati contengono riferimenti ad articoli pubblicati su riviste specialistiche o a contributi presentati in convegni scientifici: sono quindi molto utili per ricerche (anche per la tesi di laurea) su specifici argomenti

Le citazioni rimandano all'abstract o al testo pieno dell'articolo, quando disponibile

Emerging technologies for the production of nutraceuticals from agricultural by-products: A viewpoint of opportunities and challenges

Charis M. Galanakis

Agricultural (Zheng'an et al. 2016) by-products were considered for many years as undervalued substrates due to their removal from food production line and the complicated problems arise from their treatment and disposal in the environment. Nowadays, the urgent demands for sustainability in the food and agricultural sectors led to their valorization as a source of nutraceuticals (Jang Won et al. 2017). The latest are typically produced using conventional technologies with well-known technological and scale-up boundaries, which reduce their efficacy and production yield (McCarty, Ramsey, and Sandefur 2016). Emerging technologies promise to overcome these problems, but is this truth? The current viewpoint is trying to answer this question by exploring the possibility of adapting the latest technologies in the recovery downstream processing. Opportunities and challenges (Gohardoust et al. 2017) in the field are also discussed with a final aim of inspiring researchers to investigate the critical parameters that prevent for themoment (Jang Won et al. 2017) the broad commercial implementation of emerging technologies in the particular application.
